DESCRIPTION:

The two adjoining rowhouses are two stories each in height with two-bay facades oriented south across Carroll Street. The entrances are in the east or right bay with boarded transoms and openings. The boarding is missing at 848. The front steps are also missing at each house. The window and door openings are slightly arched. The sills are wood. The one-over-one sash appears to be original on the second stories, while the first floor sash, also one-over-one, may have been replaced in 846. Iron security bars shield each first story window. The cornice is continuous across both facades and has a lower molding band joining decorative brackets. The soffit is perforated with a floral design. The exposed east elevation of 846 has boarded window openings and a stucco wall surface.

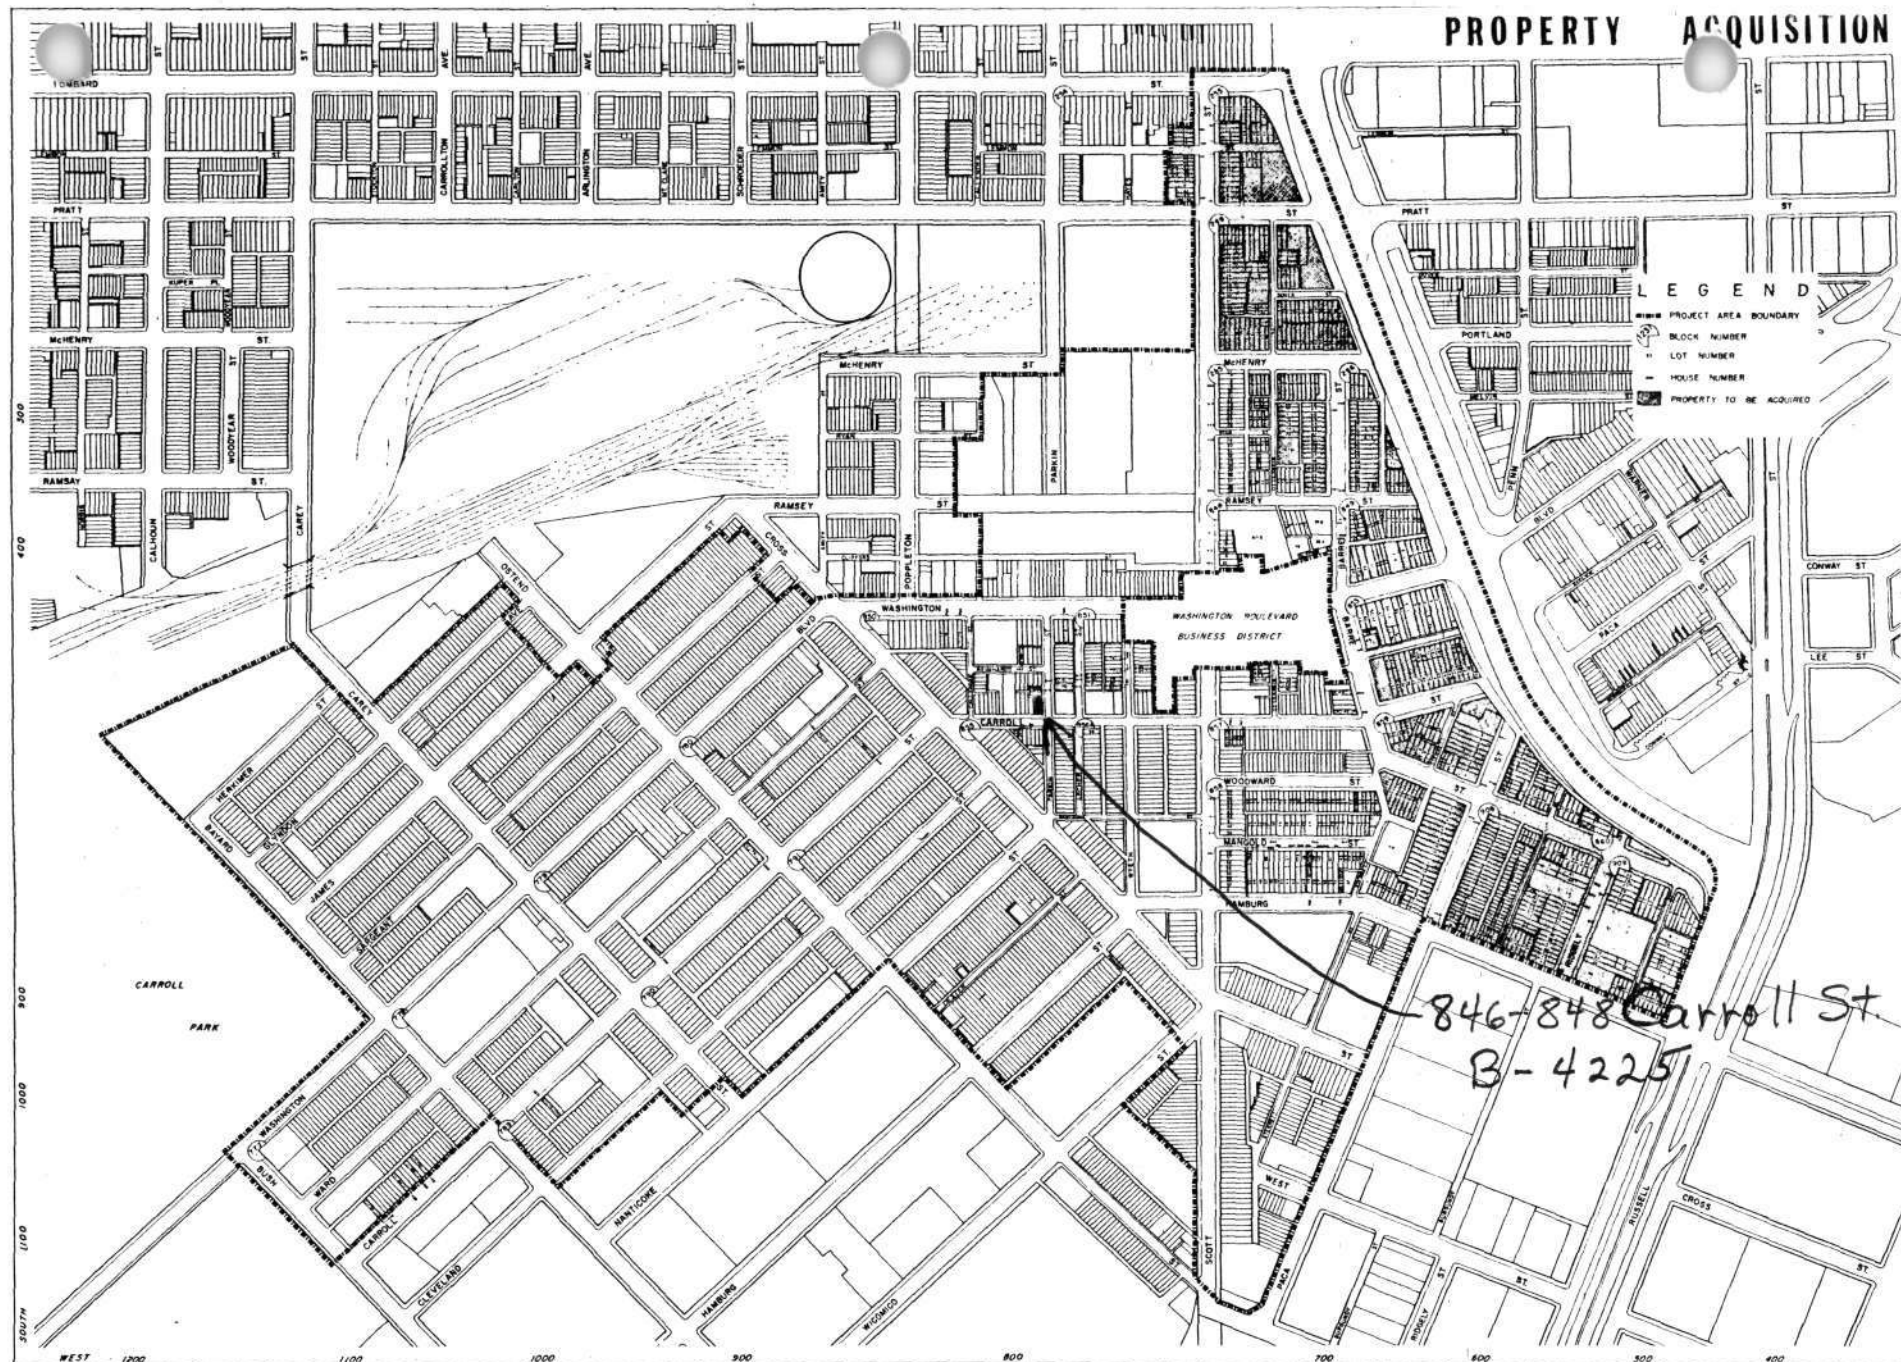

SIGNIFICANCE:

AREA: Architecture LEVEL: Local

The two rowhouses at 846-848 Carroll Street are located in and contribute to a potential historic district in "Pigtown" (now Washington Village), although boundaries have not been defined. As with 616 Scott Street (B-4224), the Carroll Street houses are typical of the late nineteenth century working class neighborhood, which takes its traditional name from the herds of pigs that were driven through the streets from the B&O Mt. Clare yards to slaughterhouses in South Baltimore. Carroll Street was one of the routes on which the pigs were herded.
